

CANARY CONCHAL

Heather Huffaker

Brigham Young Univ., Provo, UT 84602

Concept: Functional, versatile two-piece swimsuits that fit varying torso lengths. They are also easy to get in and out of for practical ease of dressing. The tank is useful for covering up while leaving the option of discretionary sunbathing. The terry cloth cover-up provides function and versatility. It is a stylized dress used as a towel substitute. The hood provides protection from the sun if necessary; immediate warmth and comfort are also included.

Inspiration: Inspired by my own love of swimming and the beach. The utilitarian trend is also incorporated into the swimming suits in the form of functional pockets and draw-strings.

Description: Yellow tank swimsuit with spaghetti straps. Bottoms have drawstring around waist and reflective tape as a detail sewn on top of the side seams.

Terry cloth cover-up is semi-fitted and hooded. Sleeves are cut in one with the bodice to give it the muscle, very capped effect. The cover-up is surplice style with a hook to keep the under side attached and two ties on the outer side edge.

Technique: Serger was used for attachment of elastic in bathing suits and for edge finishing. Eyelet attacher was used for drawstring ties at the waist of swimsuit. Buttonholes were made for drawstring ties in cover-up. Double needle was used for top stitching on the swimsuit.